THE CORPS OF ENGINEERS

The Corps of Engineers' long history of battlefield action is maintained at two levels - the Corps of Engineers and the battalion. The advantage of a "Corps" regimental framework is numerous. It formally reinforces the strong feelings and loyalities of Engineer officers and soldiers engendered by the Engineer castle, which is displayed throughout the nation and the world. The totality and unique aspects (railway construction, forestry, well drilling, and real estate) of the "Corps" history, which cannot be captured by any other alternative, will be preserved. The "Corps" regimental framework will best adapt to force structure changes, which will continue for the Engineer force. The "Corps" concept formally recognizes the diversity of the Engineer mission which span the Combat, Combat Support, and Combat Service Support functions. The "Corps" offers a natural extension to the Reserve Components, whose soldiers and units comprise approximately 70 percent of the Engineer force, while avoiding political considerations such as loss of local unit history. The Engineer battalion, the basic basic Engineer fighting unit, will be highlighted throughout the "Corps" regimental framework to further an extended sense of belonging and promote the warfighting ethos. Engineers have long had their strongest feeling of association to their branch and their battalion.
